Xenophon's (Gray 1985 defends authenticity) Cynegeticus, is a mainly technical treatise on hunting, though it is bookended by a mytho-critical preface and an anti-sophistic postscript. Despite its purportedly instructive purpose, it is in many aspects more record of hunting experience than guidebook, and certain passages serve more to evoke the mood of the hunt than to contribute to a practical purpose (Hutchinson 2009).

Coursing by humans is the pursuit of game or other animals by dogs—chiefly greyhounds and other sighthounds—catching their prey by speed, running by sight, but not by scent. Coursing was a common hunting technique, practised by the nobility, the landed and wealthy, as well as by commoners with sighthounds and lurchers. In its oldest recorded form in the Western world, as described by Arrian ...
