Playing euphonium in the treble clef is like giving a student a trumpet that plays an octave lower. They can concentrate on learning the instrument without the hassle of trying to master a new clef and new fingerings at the same time. Eventually, students are encouraged to learn bass clef and move appropriately.

Or read everything down a fifth (or down 2 lines / 2 spaces) as written. For example, an F on the 4th line Bass Clef for the Euphonium and a G on the 2nd line Treble Clef for the Trumpet are respectively the same note within the range of the instrument -- same fingering. Just the trumpet will sound an octave higher.

Transitioning from euphonium/trombone to trumpet : brass

Trombonists often get quite a raw deal when it comes to clef use in brass bands, orchestras or quintets. Very often the part will swap between the different clefs for no obvious reason, and a brass band player may get easily caught out if the music that they normally play in is just treble clef.
